for effective that the annual Consular Reports were issued separately and without unnecessary delay. If manufacturers will now read the reports for Southern China they will find that another crusade, this time in support of Consular officers, would be of great benefit to themselves. For years back these reports have been teeming with complaints that transit passes have been rendered inoperative by the heavy taxation to which goods have been exposed after they have paid the tariff import duty transit dues. The same holds good to-day, notwithstanding Consular and Ministerial remonstrances. There will be no improvement until the British Government takes a firm stand and insists upon the due fulfilment of Treaty stipulations, but the Government is not likely to take the initiative unless most interested, namely, the manufacturers, through the various Chambers of Commerce at home, bring the matter forward. On their action or non-action depends, to a very great extent, the development or stagnation of trade in China.
